The diagram illustrates a net of a cube. It consists of a central square. Attached to the left side of this square is a trapezoid that tapers from the square's edge to a point on the left. Similarly, a trapezoid tapers from the right side of the central square to a point on the right. Attached to the top side of the central square is a trapezoid that tapers from the square's edge to a point above it. Finally, a trapezoid tapers from the bottom side of the central square to a point below it. All four trapezoids are oriented such that their longer base is adjacent to the central square, and their shorter base forms the outer edge of the net.
